The Merchant

The successful merchant "saves wisely, so as to be able to spend judiciously in a time of need which will probably be greater than that of the present." He is thrifty. He saves not to hoard nor to hold, but to invest in future purchase. Where did he discover thrift? It is the flower of civilization. It is never found among the undeveloped or savage races. But civilization, in turn, is the child of religion; and not, as some have supposed, the reverse. That venerable book, the Bible, is a treatise on vital economics. Its pivotal word is "salvation," or prevention of waste. In the light of its merciless logic, the waste of physical forces, intellectual power, moral vigor, or spiritual faculties are condemned. The religious man is inevitably a "saver," his whole life is an economic one; he is not a "hoarder," a "tightwad," but a man of thrift, reserving every energy, developing each faculty, for investment at a time when largest dividends are assured. When "The Book" was scarce, men chained it to the pulpit within the CHURCH. Its truths have always been linked to the altar, but the chain has lengthened until it encircles the world. Without the CHURCH, commerce would become a rope of sand.

But the practice of thrift is not confined to merchant princes. Quite skilled in this art are those of small resources and limited incomes. There is scarcely a home in Washington where the exercise of heroic economy is not required; and the most casual observer is convinced that men who attend the CHURCH and follow its gleam have both the will and the power to practice the high art of masterful living.

On these commencement days, memory carries us back to the schools of our youth. May we never entirely forget the college campus, the classrooms, the associations of classmates and instructors. Beyond all else, let us remember with gratitude the gradual unfolding and freedom of the mind by which the vast conquest of life is met with worthy success. Memories that linger here are as fragrant as the perfume of roses that clings to the garments of them that stroll through the flower gardens of Bulgaria. But what of that great university, the CHURCH, where we learned the secret of success! Enter its portals tomorrow with gratitude for its wisdom, by which life's failures are halved and its joys doubled. Enter its gates with a secret passion to learn more of life's method and conquest from the Almighty Teacher, the Great Father and Friend of us all.
